Course Description

The goal of this course is to introduce students to the parameters of “modern drama”, a term that refers to a broad chronology and geography, even as it designates a certain canon in Euro-American dramatic literature. Our survey will span the naturalist and realist stage traditions of the second half the nineteenth century, the varied experiments of the modernist avant-garde at the beginning of the twentieth century, the post-war fascination with the absurd as well as twentieth century experiments with verisimilitude and documentary forms. Throughout, will pay close attention to what is “modern” about these plays, and think about how changing theatrical forms seek to respond to, and in turn shape, changing socio-historical circumstances. Additionally, we will trace modern drama’s changing relationship to ideas of the human body, of spectatorship, of collective ritual and performance traditions, and of justice.

Requirements

Attendance and Participation*	15 points
Connection Quizzes	15 points
Four Response Papers	40 points
Final Paper/Exam (TBA)	30 points

* Our work in this course will be developed through classroom exercises, discussions and lectures, so your presence and active participation is crucial. Active participation means that you have completed and reflected on the assigned reading for the day, that you have the day’s texts, your notebook and other materials with you and that you are an active listener to your classmates and share your own ideas with the group. Attendance is mandatory: if you attend less than %75 of the total class hours, you will automatically fail the course.

** These are approximately five unannounced quizzes that will be scattered throughout the semester, and will ask students to make connections between prior course concepts and topics and the readings that are scheduled for any given day. In other words, “connection quizzes” are not “reading quizzes” that evaluate whether or not you have read a particular text, but rather, they ask you to think about them in relation to the framework of the course.

*** The scheduled Response Papers will take the place of a traditional midterm and provide opportunities for close reading. They will consist of one single-spaced page (or approximately 750 words) and be devoted to an idea, theme or image that interests you. I will be providing a detailed prompt for these papers during the first week. The due dates are marked below with (*).
